

The Generational Effect on Social Media

Our youngest generation sets the tone while the rest of us struggle to engage

THE YEAR YOU WERE BORN HAS A PROFOUND effect on how well you ‘get’ social media, and how comfortable you feel communicating through its numerous channels. The generations—Baby Boomers, Gen X, and Gen Y—all perceive and employ social media in markedly different ways. Understanding how these generations grew up sheds light on why this is so.

Baby Boomers. Most Baby Boomers simply don’t get social media. And why should they? Born at least 50 years ago, Boomers grew up when many telephones were shared party lines; when calling long distance required operator assistance and was saved for Sunday afternoons (reserved for the few family members living out of town); when all your friends lived in your neighborhood and you went to their house to talk with them; when television was black and white, had only three stations, and only broadcast during the day; when letters were written regularly; when essay test questions were answered by handwriting in ‘blue books’; where the library was for conducting research; and record players spun 45s of Elvis embodying the breathtaking new sound of rock ‘n’ roll.

In that existence was a lot of time for personal interaction, face to face talking, and the patience for waiting. Social media is alien to that Boomer existence. Boomers ask: Where’s my privacy? How can I thrive with all these interruptions? Can’t I just talk to you? Do I really need to know what you are doing right now?!

Gen X. For this transitional generation, social media is a bit easier to get, but still, there is a bit of detachment. Gen X, in their 30s and 40s, grew up with the proliferation of computers; with green screen terminals morphing into desktop computers; when email, word processors, and desktop publishing spawned electronic communication; when the world wide web was liberated from the dusty halls of academia; when work environments increasingly became international and neighborhoods became developments; when television transformed into 24-hour cable with its incumbent dozens of channels; when overnight delivery mushroomed; with essay answers written on word processors; and when Elvis acted in grade B movies and crooned formula tunes on tacky remote beach sets.

Gen X borders the simpler lives of their Boomer parents, as well as the convoluted lives of their Gen Y children. Gen X began the transition from interpersonal to electronic communication, so they can more easily accept the constant communication by machine, the interruptive nature and eroding of privacy engendered by social media.

Gen Y. Born plugged in, Gen Y is digitally active. Gen Y is about to turn 30. For them, everything is now. For their entire lives, everything has been computerized; physical boundaries have never existed, enabling global awareness; mobile phones have keyboards, so communication by voice, text, and images is immediate; long distance is irrelevant; Internet access has always been at their fingertips, replacing archaic cable television and libraries; eroding physical neighborhoods have been replaced with online social networks of friends, many of whom are not physically known, with varying levels of privilege—yet these friends mean everything; essay answers are emailed to teachers; music is downloaded, transported, and played on devices not much bigger than a credit card; and Elvis who?

Perhaps there has never been a generation of teenagers and 20-year-olds who have had such a profound influence on society as Gen Y. They get social media because they live it every moment; they created it and continue to define it.

Where does that leave us? Clearly, the different generations approach and embrace social media at decidedly different levels. Consider how each generation handles elements of social media.

- ◆ Interruptions. Constant. It’s not uncommon to respond to a text message while watching a movie and surfing the Internet. Everyone’s attention span is becoming shorter and shorter. Communication must be short, and visual.
- ◆ Privacy. Gone. What happened to it? Social networking sites, blogging, and streaming video enabled showcasing the intricacies of your personal and professional life to the world. Boomers see this as eroding privacy; Gen X doesn’t mind; Gen Y embraces it. After all, only your ‘friends’ are seeing it, right?
- ◆ Immediacy. It used to be that when your phone call went unanswered, only you knew. There was a certain finality in it. You moved on. Then answering machines came along. After an initial adjusting period (must I talk to a machine), they became essential and expected. Now, contact seems instantaneous and unavoidable, and with caller ID, missed call logs, text messages, picture messages, email, instant messenger, and social network mail, it is.

How are you coping with it all?

The bottom line. Gen X took television to the next level of cable and satellite. Gen Y is taking the Internet and the world wide web to the next level—social media. 🌐

—RICH MAGGIANI

Solari assists utilities with creating their integrated resource plans (IRPs) through an integrated resource, distribution, and grid planning process for incorporating renewable generation.

©2019 Solari Communication. All Rights Reserved.
www.SolariCommunication.com 802.879.9330